“ The first time I met Grandma Pat I was 12 years old. I was pretty much a permanent fixture at Holt's and Grandma Pat took me right in. She even told me " grandchildren are a blessing and she was blessed to have one more."

She was reminded of this blessing after she got off the phone with the Sheriff calling about 2 kids playing catch with a football... Over cars on the highway. With a stern lecture, chores added, her punishment was swift and absolute. It came with a suppressed smile and a plate of her amazing sugar cookies.

The first Funeral I ever went to was with Grandma Pat for Aunt Mae. Having never been to a funeral but seeing so many on TV I wore all black. As I was helping Grandma Pat out of the car I noticed I was the only one wearing black and the surprise must have been showing on my face cause Grandma Pat took her arm around mine and said "People are not wearing black as to celebrate her life but in death there is loss, sadness and black is equally acceptable." It was the first time I had ever heard of a celebration of life.

That someone lived a life so full that people would celebrate their life instead of their death. In what was such a foreign concept so long ago I understand today and though I am saddened greatly by her passing I will celebrate her life and I am grateful for the part she played in mine
